One of the most controversial policies of the Obama Justice Department is the use of consent decrees. Consent decrees are agreements between the government and a city or county that are designed to address patterns of unconstitutional policing. However, critics argue that consent decrees have been used to unfairly target African Americans.

For example, the Ferguson consent decree, which was entered into after the shooting of Michael Brown by a white police officer, required the Ferguson Police Department to make a number of changes, including hiring more African American officers and increasing the use of body cameras. However, critics argue that the consent decree has not been effective in reducing racial disparities in policing.

Another controversial policy of the Obama Justice Department is the use of "pattern or practice" investigations. Pattern or practice investigations are investigations into whether a police department has a pattern or practice of unconstitutional policing. However, critics argue that pattern or practice investigations have been used to unfairly target African Americans.

For example, the Baltimore consent decree, which was entered into after the death of Freddie Gray while in police custody, was based on a pattern or practice investigation. However, critics argue that the investigation was not thorough and that it did not take into account the unique challenges faced by the Baltimore Police Department.

The Obama Justice Department has also been accused of being too lenient on white-collar criminals. For example, the department has been criticized for its handling of the financial crisis, which disproportionately affected African Americans.

, there is evidence to suggest that the Obama Justice Department has had a racial agenda. This agenda has been reflected in the department's policies, which have disproportionately targeted African Americans.

Impact on Race Relations

The policies of the Obama Justice Department have had a significant impact on race relations in the United States. These policies have led to increased distrust between African Americans and the police, and have contributed to the perception that the criminal justice system is biased against African Americans.

A 2016 study by the Pew Research Center found that 74% of African Americans believe that the criminal justice system is biased against them. This is a significant increase from the 58% of African Americans who said the same thing in 2008.

The policies of the Obama Justice Department have also contributed to the rise of the Black Lives Matter movement. This movement has been fueled by anger over the deaths of African Americans by police, and has called for an end to police brutality and racial profiling.

The Obama Justice Department's policies have had a significant impact on race relations in the United States. These policies have led to increased distrust between African Americans and the police, and have contributed to the perception that the criminal justice system is biased against African Americans.

Call to Action

The policies of the Obama Justice Department have had a negative impact on race relations in the United States. It is time for a change. We need to demand that the Justice Department adopt policies that are fair and just to all Americans, regardless of their race.

Here are some things that you can do to help:

- Contact your elected officials and let them know your concerns about the Obama Justice Department's policies.

- Support organizations that are working to reform the criminal justice system.
- Educate yourself about the issues facing African Americans in the United States.

Together, we can make a difference.
